

New England Restraining Act

The New England Restraining Act was passed by Parliament in order to punish the colonies for their boycott of British goods. The law prohibited the New England colonies from trading with any other country except Great Britain or the British West Indies. It also excluded New Englanders from the profitable codfishing industry.