

George Washington Accepts His Appointment

In this speech, George Washington accepts the position of Commander-in-Chief of the Continental Army. Washington declined to accept a salary for the position. Although independence had not yet been declared, the Continental Congress decided that the colonies needed to create a professional army in order to defend their liberties against British attack.